

7 Types of Students Who Love Lecture Capture

More and more of today's students are expecting their classes to be available on video. But are they all looking for the same thing? Let's explore the types of lecture watchers!

The Speed Dater

It's the day after registrar's deadline to change classes, and everyone's finally settled into their choices for the semester...but this student missed a couple classes while deciding!

Let students catch back up on those first few classes so they can have a successful semester.

The Missing in Action

Sometimes students are going to miss a class. They got sick. They broke a leg. They had an away game or a job interview or a family emergency.

Captured lectures help everyone catch up and stay on top of learning.

The Long-Distance Relationship

Not every member of your community may be on campus. Bring in students from the wider community—and the wider world.

Lecture capture helps you reach a wider audience by making your classroom virtual.

The Podcaster

This student wants to listen to lectures on the go—on the train, while working out, on a visit home to the family.

Videos can be consumed anywhere—a classroom on the mobile device in your pocket.

The Speedster

Some students cram as much into their time in college as possible. Regular people just talk too slow!

Recorded lectures can be played at double-speed—or 1.5x or 3x or whatever you'd like—so information can be absorbed faster.

The Play-It-Again-Sam

Maybe this isn't their first language. Maybe they have special needs. Maybe this is just a really complicated concept and they need a couple more rounds of explanation.

Video lets students slow down the pace and repeat key sections as many times as they need, without slowing down the class.

The Panicker

A lot of information gets covered in a semester. By the time exams roll around, this student panics about forgetting those first couple lectures. The night before finals seems like the perfect time to rewatch everything.

Give students a chance to go back and review class materials in time for exams to make sure information sticks!

Today's students want every class on campus to be captured. Need advice? Contact us at www.kaltura.com!

